"How can we Address and Prevent Veteran Homelessness in our Communities?"

Day after day, week after week, month after month, year after year, soldiers go from being heroes to no one in today's society. These brave men risk their lives on the front end, so Americans can continue to live their lives with freedom and rights. No one deserves to go through the traumatic and painful experiences these soldiers endure, and yet they still are forgotten after retirement. There are various ideas that can be addressed to prevent veteran homelessness in communities across America. People should contact their state politicians, there should be activities in the community, and people should interact with veterans to prevent homelessness ex-soldiers. There are politicians in power that can make a difference.

As a nation, it is a priority to contact politicians like mayors and state senators to come up with laws that will prevent homelessness for ex-soldiers. These laws would make a difference in society as it would show that America cares for these people. Ex-soldiers do not deserve to be left alone on the streets. They are the reason why Americans show pride in their country. If laws cannot be passed or are not accepted, then each state should do something to reduce the amount of these homeless people.

America should be ashamed for letting this topic become a reality, but there are many activities to prevent and stop this nonsense. People within communities could contact veteran shelters and support them to the best of their abilities. Also, there could be fundraisers, and that money could be sent out to charities meant for them. Finally, helping out at soup kitchens that are specifically intended for these types of veterans could have a significant impact on them. Essentially, all these activities would require some type of communication with the ex-soldiers.
Hopefully, one's knowledge of what exactly a veteran is will improve after interacting with at least one veteran. The more interactions people have with them, the better for one's knowledge. This will give people a better perspective on what it means to be a veteran. Those people would and should pass that information around the communities. One does not know the type of sacrifices these people make for America and its people, so I encourage everyone to open up their warm hearts and help out.

Of course, there are many more ways of helping out these heroes of America, but I know these are the most efficient ones. Without soldiers volunteering to protect the United States of America, this country would not be the same as it is now. This country would not even exist if these soldiers were not risking their lives. People can and should get in touch with their state representatives, they should try different activities in their communities, and they should find ways to bond with the veterans. It is never too late to improve the lives of America's heroes for they are the reason this nation continues to advance.
